

Pritham Raj, MD, FACP

Psychiatrist, Active Recovery TMS

Dr. Raj specializes in the relationship between general internal medicine and psychiatry. He earned his medical degree from the University of Maryland School of Medicine. He completed his Combined Residency Training in Internal Medicine and Psychiatry at Duke University Medical Center.

Dr. Raj was the Medical Director for the Adventist Health Portland's Emotional Wellness Center, which he founded. He was responsible for building a team to deliver a full spectrum of mental health services, including TMS. He also serves as an associate professor at Oregon Health and Science University (OHSU) in the departments of Internal Medicine and Psychiatry and mentors and assists medical students at all levels of their education.

Dr. Raj has done clinical research in obesity, depression in the critically-ill, and mild cognitive impairment and dementia. Drawn to how emotional wellness affects physical health, Dr. Raj Completed Chief Wellness Officer training at Stanford University WellMD Program under Tait Shanafelt in 2019. He has provided multiple expert presentations on how the COVID-19 pandemic has affected individuals both physically and mentally.

Dr. Raj served as Medical Director of the extensive Internal Medicine practice (IMC at Marquam Hill) in OHSU's flagship hospital for over seven years, leading 80 strong faculty and residents. He served on several vital committees at OHSU, including the Admissions Committee of the School of Medicine.

In his spare time, Dr. Raj enjoys spending time with his three children. He is the president of DARK to Light, a nonprofit he founded to support the recovery of children whose families are going through separation and divorce.
